Mr. E. A. Dayton, of this city, has written the following letter, descriptive of the gold bearing region of Eastern Virginia, to the Editor of the American Journal of Mining:

"Without recounting the geological structure of the belt of country lying between the Eastern Range, or Blue Ridge, of the Alleghenies and tide water, it is sufficient to know that the eastern edge of this belt is traversed by veins, or leads of gold bearing quartz rock, in width from one to fifty feet, of an unknown trough, then cropping out, in a nearly northeast and southwest course for miles. For a long period of years, placer mining, with pan and rocker, (as well as at the present time,) has been carried on in this section. About twenty years ago the Eagle mine, near United States Ford, on the Rappahannock, was discovered, and was soon worked with machinery. New discoveries were made, and machinery put to work pushing the quartz, till when the late war broke out, there were eight or ten extensive mines in operation, worked by the most improved machinery, and in the most improved manner as regards the mining department—all located within a few miles of the Eagle mine. As the contending armies swayed to and fro through Virginia, this mining section often came in the direct line of march, and was quite often the scene of bloody contests, as the fallen timber, hastily constructed earthworks, and sunken burial pits, fully attest. Like all other property, that of the mines suffered great damage at the hands of the soldiers and the thieves, who had been plundering the works of almost every movable thing, since the war. Some of the works have been burned, nearly destroying the stamping or pumping and hoisting engines; most have been stripped of the outside covering, doors and windows, and the hoisting of the shafts has been pulled down; the cribbing of the shafts has been burned or has rotted away, and, in fact, ruin meets the eye on every hand. The mines lost many tons of good quartz, carried away as specimens by the soldiers; cart loads would disappear in a single day of the kinds that showed the glittering pyrites or sulphates. The Eagle mine was kept in operation till July, 1862, although their powder was taken away by the authorities in the summer of 1861, which compelled them to abandon working in the main shaft and drift. They then opened the vein where it cropped out, a half a mile to the north, and worked it till the final stoppage. I was not able to learn much of the workings of the mines, and could judge only by what is to be seen above ground. The Eagle mines ran 24 stamps and two Chilian mills. The pumpjack and hoisting was done by an engine of about 75 horse-power; the works are in ruins—on the south side of the river and seven miles from Fredericksburg, is the Motomac mine, abandoned some years before the war; it was told that the vein ran out or was lost in fact. The mill is in ruins, although the engine, etc., yet remain. Following up the north side of the Rappahannock river, two miles from Elys' ford is the Liberty mine. It was worked by an engine of near 200 horse-power, of the best construction, as was also the other machinery. The buildings and machinery have been stripped of all the small parts. They worked 24-stamps and two Chilian mills, besides some other mills which had been abandoned. The vein runs in a northeast and southwesterly course, and has been opened on the surface about 500 feet. I could not learn that there had been any shaft sunk; but was told that the works stopped in 1858-9; the reason why, I was not able to ascertain. About two miles to the northeast is the Wyckoff mine, apparently on the same vein as the Liberty. The vein was worked by several shafts, and by an engine independent of the stamping mill, which is a fourth of a mile west of the vein; it was operated by a very large engine of about 250 horse power—24 stamps were used, which were given a revolving motion with the drop; two Chilian mills, as well as a general assortment of crushing, or pulverizing mills, that had been thrown aside. The building and engine had been stripped of all that was portable by a "man." If there were other buildings than the mill and farm house on the property, they have disappeared. The works were stopped in 1861. The Franklin mine is a mile and a half from the Wyckoff, and supposed to be on the same vein. They are yet in good condition as when they stopped in 1861, except the natural decay. The main drift was sunk about 100 feet and a drift carried down the vein near 200 feet. Attached to the stamp-mill is a saw and corn mill. Crossing the Rappahannock by Elys' ford, at which point there is a very fine water power and a very fine mill, and the Rapidan, by Wyckoff's ford, the first mine is the Malvern. The vein crosses the river at nearly right angles to its course. Hills about 175 feet high rise from the side of the river, the vein cropping out on the top. There is 14 feet fall in the river at this point, furnishing abundant power to pump the quartz, which was the manner of raising the vein when it was first opened from the drift by a drift, allowing the water to flow out of the mine, and the rock to run out in cars of its own weight. This manner of working the mine was abandoned. An engine and hoisting were erected on the highest point of the drift; a shaft was sunk, making it necessary to haul all of the rock and water, and to clear the property of timber for fuel, in place of using the water that costs nothing! It is evident that this mine possesses superior advantages for working to any of the others. The buildings, etc., are in good condition, except the natural decay. The mine was worked up to 1862, when it was abandoned. On the north side of the river is the site of the Culpeper mine. It was abandoned some years before the war—why, I could not ascertain. Half a mile south of the Malvern mine is the Vaecker, which is likely on the same vein. Its course is nearly northeast and southwest, and varies in width from ten to thirty feet. The main shaft was worked with a large water-beam engine. The buildings were burned during the war, badly damaging the engine, pump-connections, etc. Near the mine shaft, the vein was worked from the surface. At this point the vein is fifty feet wide. A shaft was dug sixty feet deep and the vein was struck at the surface. On its sloping side was a winding road, up which the quartz was carted. To the south was another shaft, worked by a wheel. The stamp mill, etc., are situated a fourth of a mile to the east, and was run by a large and very good engine, that is, three sets of six stamps each, with two Chilian mills, with a large as-sement of grinding mills that have been abandoned. Some process for desulphurizing must have been used quite extensively, for there are the furnaces for twelve pans remaining. The engine and works have been badly damaged, yet the laborers' dwellings, the boarding house, the superintendent's house have suffered very little damage. The mine was worked up to, and a portion of the year 1862. A mile south is the Ambler mine property, through which passes the plank road. The works are in ruins, and were abandoned some years before the war. I was told that it was not possible to keep out the water and quicksands. At this point commenced the battle of the Wilderness. Here is the north end of the hastily-constructed works, made of logs, earth, and brush, ending at Appomattox Court House. At some points the line is straight, then again curved in or out, or making an angle to the right or left, over hills, across ravines or streams. The ground is yet strewn with the debris of battle, but soon all signs of the graves will be obliterated. The quartz veins are easily traced from this point in a northeasterly course to the Potomac river near Georgetown. Much of the soil is quartz rock, pebbles and sand, without fertility, much broken with abrupt hills, and mostly covered with woods, much of it of ancient growth. Little of the land is cleared; for it lays midway between the river and railway, and too far from both to pay for transportation of the unmanufactured timber. If the quartz paid a profit to mine at one point it will likely pay at others; and between the two extremes where it has been worked, there is room for hundreds of mining companies with abundance of wood and water power. There is known to be valuable minerals, iron, signs of lead and copper, soapstone, plumbago, etc. The lands can be bought cheap, are lightly taxed, are bordered on either side by as good farming lands as there are in Virginia, and lay at the feet of the northern capitalist; and yet they go and scatter their money in the far West, without looking at Virginia!"
